SOUTH OF BIR LEFA, LIBYA, 12 JUNE 1942: Even though an almost unbroken series of mistakes and defeats had befallen the British since the Gazala battles had begun on the 27th of May, on the morning of the 11th of June neither side could honestly be said to have possessed a decisive superiority. Both the Axis and the British forces had suffered severe casualties, the Germans most importantly in infantry and the British in armor, but both sides were relatively the same strength, especially where the most powerful armored forces lay facing each other—at Knightsbridge. The British decided to attack the 15th Panzer Division on the next day, the 12th of June, and to allow for this the 2nd Armoured Brigade joined the 4th Armoured Brigade. But a confusion in orders and the sudden disappearance from the field of a key British commander compelled the two armored brigades to halt and wait for orders in a position south of Bir Lefa. Rommel immediately seized the opportunity and struck the stopped British tanks with the 15th Panzer Division from the south and the 21st Panzer Division from the northwest. The result was reported succinctly in the British Official History, as having, “disastrous consequences for the British.” ...

ASLComp AFRIKAKORPS™ continues the series of desert warfare with scenario packs AK #7-12. All of the scenarios are played on the 22” x 34” desert mapsheet using new color overlays and now things are expanded to include 2-map scenarios to provide the largest desert game-play surface ever. FRONTIER POST, LIBYAN-EGYPTIAN BORDER, 12 JUNE 1940: The frontier wire was some 12 feet wide and 16 feet high; the Italians had built it along the Libya-Egypt border from the coast near Sollum to the oasis of Jarabub, 150 miles to the south. On 12 June patrols from the 11th Hussars and the KRRC quickly breached the wire. Attacking at dawn and out of the rising sun, the Hussars surprised and confused the Italian defenders, who watched as their machinegun posts were suppressed by British mortar fire and their tankettes destroyed by British armored cars and close-range machinegun fire from Vickers tanks. These raids continued through the rest of June and July of 1940, until the British 7th Armoured Division was recalled for a refit in Egypt. The raids destroyed many Italian vehicles, considerable supplies of ammunition and petrol, and significant water storage. Twenty-five Italian officers (including a general of engineers) and five hundred other ranks were captured. This series of raids also marked the beginning of an overall erosion of Italian morale, as the inadequacy of their tank armor and the scarcity of effective antitank weapons and ammunition became apparent.

Near FORT MADDALENA, LIBYA, 12 JUNE 1940: The men of the 11th Hussars (Prince Albert's Own) donned their rubber-soled shoes on the night of 12 June and as quickly and as quietly as possible, made gaps in the frontier wire, flattening fence-posts by driving over them and breaking off the wire by bending it back and forth over the bonnets of their Rolls Royce armored cars. Troop Number 4 of 'A' Squadron fired the first shots of the night near Fort Maddalena, firing in the direction of a group of approaching headlamps. The sparks from the bullets' impacts indicated that the target was armored. When the tanks did not stop, 'A' Squadron withdrew, receiving machine-gun fire from the nearby fort as they departed. 1st Troop also engaged a low-flying Italian aircraft circling overhead in the night sky. Headquarters Squadron, moving with 'B' Squadron, had the first real effective engagement with the enemy. After breaking the wire, the unit fanned out north and south, searching for the Italians, while Major Geoffrey Miller deployed the HQ Squadron to guard the gaps in the wire and to be ready to cover the withdrawal of his patrols. Around 0200 hours, Major Miller noticed vehicle lights approaching. Because he had orders to find out which desert tracks the Italians were using, he allowed one truck to go through the gap in the wire unmolested. He then began to move forward to set up an ambush, but before he could accomplish this, more Italian trucks approached, headlights blazing. Headquarters Squadron opened up on them with everything they had. The Italians haphazardly returned fire for a brief time before they surrendered. Although outnumbered, Headquarters Squadron made off with two Italian officers, fifty other ranks, nine Breda automatics, sixty rifles, and several boxes of hand grenades. All in all it was a good night's work for Tommy Atkins.

Near NEZVET GHIRBA, LIBYA, 16 June 1940: Two troops of 'C' Squadron, 11th Hussars, were 'swanning about' on the Libyan side of the frontier wire when one of the armored car commanders spied an Italian column of L3 tankettes and truck-borne infantry moving north along the track toward Fort Capuzzo. This sighting was promptly reported to the squadron HQ, while at the same time the leader of the second troop reported another enemy column moving eastbound on a converging course with the first. An immediate withdrawal was ordered, too late for the commander of the first troop, 2nd Lieutenant Gape, who had already driven up on the first column and opened fire. The sound of battle reached 2nd Lieutenant Dier, the troop CO, who was already on his way back to the Libyan side of the wire. By the time Dier arrived Gape had knocked out two L3s, but was harried by fire from the rest whose fire had punctured a tire on his second car. Dier immediately opened fire, knocking out another L3, and frightening the others off. While all this action was going on an Italian field gun, further back in the column, was unhooked and swung into action. As it let fly both Hussar troops wisely fled to the shelter of a small rise from which Gape radioed back the latest enemy developments.

GHIRBA, LIBYA, 16 JUNE 1940: By 16 June, British operations were increasing in tempo and netting surprising results. Fort Maddalena surrendered to 'A' Squadron, 11th Hussars, when British armored cars surrounded the fort while the RAF bombarded it from the air. Similarly, the white flag was run up at Fort Capuzzo after the 7th Hussars and a company of the 1st Battalion, King's Royal Rifle Corps approached. In the latter case a lone RAF bomb exploded one hundred yards from the fort. Two key Italian forts on the frontier had fallen at the cost of two British soldiers killed and four wounded. On 16 June, Combe Force (a task force composed of squadrons from both Hussar regiments) approached a gaggle of Italian conscripts and Italian armor, formed into a square in the middle of a large open area. The intrepid men of 'A' Squadron, 7th Hussars, reduced by mines and breakdowns, advanced on the Italian positions. Suddenly seven tankettes charged from the square—only to be shot to pieces. The British vehicles then circled the square twice, pouring machine-gun fire into the midst of the enemy infantry. The Italians finally had enough and retaliated by revealing four artillery pieces hidden under tarps, one at each corner of the square. The Italian gun-crews commenced firing only to be silenced by machine-gun fire. When some Eritreans tried to flee, armored cars of 'A' Squadron shot their trucks to pieces. An attempt by the remaining tankettes was similarly foiled.

Coastal road, east of SOLLUM, 13 SEPTEMBER 1940: Under threat of being removed from command, General Graziani kicked off an offensive intended to capture Alexandria. The drive of his 10th Army consisted of four infantry divisions, two motorized regiments, an armored group, and a lightly armored reconnaissance battalion. Commanded by General Bergonzoli (soon to be known around the world as barba elettrica, "electric whiskers"), Italian forward elements were closely monitored by a British covering force commanded by General Gott. The advance moved out in two columns, one along the coast road through Sollum, the other through the desert south of the escarpment that parallels to the coast. A spectacular artillery display heralded the coastal column's progress. The heavy shelling struck an unoccupied airfield and barracks at Sollum, and some parcels of empty desert. When the dust cleared, the British saw a phalanx of Italian motorcycles, tanks, and other vehicles drawn up before them, as if on parade. Difficult terrain, searing temperatures (and the loss of several water trucks), sandstorms, and anti-tank mines slowed the advance to a mere twelve and a half miles a day. Close Italian formations made excellent targets for the British artillery and swooping Blenheims. The desert column soon gave up on its exposed route and descended from the escarpment to join the forces on the coast road. The British fell back as planned, unhurried, enjoying a gunner's paradise of closely-packed vehicles. On the 16th, the Italians occupied abandoned Sidi Barrani—a small village consisting of a few mud and brick huts, a police station and a mosque. Mussolini proudly announced over national radio that the trams were again running in Sidi Barrani. A white horse was picked from the stables of Il Duce. A victory parade was anticipated.

NIBEIWA, EGYPT, 9 DECEMBER 1940: At the start of Operation Compass General O'Connor decided to stage a diversionary attack by the 4th Battalion, 7th Regiment Rajputana Rifle Regiment east of the Italian position while sending 1st Battalion, 6th Rajputana Rifle Regiment, the 2nd Queen's Own Cameron Scottish Highlanders (11th Indian Brigade), and Lieutenant Colonel R.M. Jerram's 7th Royal Tank Regiment consisting of forty-eight "I" tanks and the 72 guns of the 4th Indian Divisional Artillery through the gap in the Italian defensive position only covered by mines. No Italian patrols were met. Even at this late stage, most British ranks thought that they were merely conducting 'Training Exercise #2'. British officers watched in amazement as the Matilda tanks approached the northwest corner of the Italian defense. At 0500 the diversionary attack from the east woke the enemy, diverting their attention from the final moves of the assault force. By 0600 all was quiet again and the Italians began the early morning camp routine. As daylight increased a light haze covered the desert as the thick dew began to evaporate. At 0700 British artillery registered on the camp and at 0715 fired for effect as the Matildas and MkVIs rumbled into the camp from the NW corner. About 20-25 Italian medium and light tanks were caught unmanned, and quickly were put out of action. The British tanks then turned their attention to the Italian artillery and anti-tank guns. Immediately following the tanks into the breach were the 1st/6th Rajputana Rifles and the 2nd Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders. Italian commander General Maletti was killed by a burst of machine-gun fire from one of the Matildas. By 1040 it was all over; the British captured 2,000 prisoners and 35 tanks for the loss of 48 ranks and 8 officers.

TUMMAR WEST CAMP, EGYPT, 9 DECEMBER 1940: While the 11th Indian Brigade was capturing Nibeiwa, Brigadier Lloyd's 5th Indian Brigade (the 1st Royal Fusiliers, the 3/1st Punjab Regiment, and the 4th Battalion, 6th Rajputana Rifles) and a regiment of the 4th Indian Division's artillery were moving in a wide arc to the west of Nibeiwa, preparing to attack the next objective, Tummar West. The 7th Royal Tank Regiment had no time to gloat over the havoc they had caused at Nibeiwa; no sooner were they finished there than they were dispatched to support the 5th Indian Brigade. Unfortunately, six tanks were damaged by a minefield they encountered west of the Italian position. Some time had to be taken to reconnoiter the Tummar defenses; the attack could not be launched until afternoon, by which time the element of surprise had been lost. In addition, the weather deteriorated; a sandstorm rose, making target recognition difficult. Encamped at Tummar West, some 13,000 yards north of Nibeiwa, General Pescatori's 2nd Libyan Division had planned to march to the sound of the guns as soon as the British attacked. With Nibeiwa taken so quickly, he had to settle into a defensive stance. He barely had time to place mines closer to his position in the direction of the enemy, leading to a position which trapped Pescatori's rear against his own minefields. Cornered, the Italians began a spirited attack to break out westward, only to be broken up by British artillery. Again, the Italian gunners put up a stiff fight, only to be broken by their inability to defeat the Matildas' armor. The Italians made a final bid to press the weight of their numbers against the enemy by closing to fight at the range of grenade and bayonet, but their charges were uncoordinated and continued British artillery fire prevented any large groups from assembling. By dusk, the Italian position was in British hands, though at a slightly heavier cost to the Commonwealth than was expected.

Coastal Road west of ALAM EL DAB, EGYPT, 10 December 1940: The camp at Nibeiwa had fallen, its defense collapsing less than an hour after its commander, General Maletti, was killed while firing a machine-gun from his bedside, after he retired to his tent after being wounded. With it came the first 'haul' of booty of the desert war. Northward toward the coast beyond Nibeiwa the British advance continued, as Alan Moorehead wrote in The March to Tunis, "...with a precision and speed that outstripped all communications." Following the fall of Nibeiwa, one section of the armored division headed off into the desert in the direction of Sofafi. Another portion headed for the coast between Buq Buq and Sidi Barrani while another headed directly for Sidi Barrani, mopping up a series of Italian forts along the way. Maktila on the coast also fell to the seemingly inexorable British advance, following a naval bombardment. On the morning of the third day of the British offensive Wavell's men turned their attention to the defences of Sidi Barrani itself, pushing forward with all haste—and sending the tanks and men forward without waiting for the artillery to catch up. As the British moved on, heavy winds picked up the fine sand as the bane of all desert-dwellers, the Khamsin, picked up intensity. Visibility soon shut down, from a hundred, then to fifty yards. The combatants joined a running battle in the choking heat and dust over two miles of rocky desert. While the sandstorms worsened, the 1st Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders of the 6th Brigade took on the task of cutting the coastal road west of Sidi Barrani. Doing so would trap yet more Italian units in the British snare, as well as allow the British to move swiftly up the coast. The task was not easy—lack of transport, bad navigation and the continuing sandstorms had the Highlanders on the go for more than 24 hours straight. In addition, they were low on water and had gotten lost in the storm twice on their way to the objective. Still, they arrived just after noon on the 10th, looking forward to a break. No such luck. They arrived just before an advancing column of Italian Blackshirts, equally wrung out by the storm and a hard march. Both sides paused to assemble men and equipment. A furious firefight erupted, with both sides suffering serious losses. The tough stance assumed by the Italians was for naught, however, as tanks from 7th Armoured Brigade arrived to stiffen Scottish resolve. With no way out, the Blackshirts joined tens of thousands of their comrades in the prisoner pens.
