During Prohibition, the U.S. Treasury Department authorized physicians to write prescriptions for medicinal alcohol. You could go down to your local sawbones and get him to hook you up with some hooch. Most doctors during this time would get by on just doing just that. Every ten days, patients willing to pay about $3 for a prescription and another $3 or $4 to have it filled could get a pint of booze. "There may have been some people who were being prescribed because there was a perceived medical need, but it was really a way for some physicians and pharmacists to make a few extra bucks,"

Armed with pads of government-issued prescription forms, advised Dr. Levon advise his patients to take regular doses of hooch to stave off a number of ailments—cancer, indigestion and depression.
