A massive force-modernization program begun in 1995 has steadily improved the training of basic troops. The intent is to have a high mobility light forces. The NCO corps is small, poorly trained, and with little responsibility. Platoon and company level officers can exercise no discretion in executing orders and reacting to changes in the battlefield (they simply pass the information to higher and await instructions)

Option: Personnel attached to the Airborne Brigade add Parachute 30 (new Value 150/Cost 135)

The Grupo Areotransportado de Fuerzas Especiales are company-sized Ranger-like units. One is assigned to each of Mexico's twelve military districts, where they serve as a rapid deployment force. As the name implies, this is primarily a helicopter borne force. They receive heavy US support because one of their assigned missions is anti-drug work. They are most active in Chiapas and Guerrero. Requires Infantry package.

This is a true special operations capable force which receives extensive training from 7th SFGA (one to three MTTs are in country at any one time). This is the only unit in the Mexican Army with a solid NCO corps. Deployments are often done without the knowledge of local units. SF uses different weapons and equipment than regular forces, often very similar to US forces. Requires GAFE package.

Most Mexican police departments are hampered by massive corruption, criminal activity and a lack of funding. Along the US border many departments used confiscated American cars as patrol vehicles. They are also much more likely to use their firearms than probably any other force in the world (running from the police justifies use of force).

Heavily armed, these units are very likely to assault even when the situation could be peacefully ended with only a little time. Corruption is also rampant (the La Paz unit raided the local jail to free two members arrested on drug charges. Members of the Mexico City unit, Force F, were indicted on murder charges and when Federal Authorities showed up to make arrests were fired upon. In the end, Army Special Forces used 4.2-inch mortar fire to destroy their barracks.) Requires Police package.

This national counter-terrorist force, Grupo Antiterrorista, was raised in the early-90s to deal with high profile situations (police SWAT teams having high hostage casualty rates). They are also tasked with intelligence gathering, direct action (not typical police missions) and reportedly assassinations. They operate primarily in Mexico City, the major tourist cities, and Chiapas. GAT draws personnel from the military as well as police. Requires SWAT package.

Mexico has a massive highway system that ranges from eight lane divided to two lanes of potholes. The only thing in common on these varied roadways are the highway police. Corruption is massive with no distinction between locals and tourists.
